In Mayor of the Village, Watt stages the gallery with the trappings of a café, referencing the international coffee house aesthetic popular in the 1990s and 2000s. A patchwork of booth-backs rendered with patterned and novelty fabrics; a chalkboard menu adorned with paillettes, themselves bearing a crossword of food items; a pair of softly glowing pendant lights framing the entryway; traces of luminescent rainbow reflecting on the floor. The materials reference a design both dated and comforting, one that signals the café as a natural gathering place, a seemingly uncomplicated site of community and camaraderie.

On the east wall of the gallery, Watt renders a crude mural of a coffee cup, a design traced from the back of a café chair found in a Davie Street laundromat (itself depicted in Laundry Valet). On top of this work, he has installed a pair of sculptures taking the form of mugs. Watt describes these as imageless artworks, the void of their dark interiors framed neatly by white enamel-painted rims. The exterior mesh of the sculptures, however, reveals a tangle of Rube-Goldbergesque forms, gesturing both to coffee's propulsive social force, as well as the persistent machinations – economic, aesthetic and otherwise – that structure even the most casual of communal interactions.

- 9 Laundry Valet, 2024
archival cardboard, graph paper, construction paper, oil pastel, mat board, vinyl cupboard liner, wire, sequins, duct tape, aluminum tape, acetate gels, feathers, acrylic plastic, lint, quarters, stickers, crystals, doily, pipe cleaner, silk organza, bristol board, window mesh, lamé piping, acrylic paint, string, thread, glitter paper, carpet, cardboard tube, popsicle sticks, sand paper, straws, wire mesh, chain, fabric, leather, grommet

Within the environment of the cafe, Watt hangs a show-within-a-show, bringing together a selection of the intricate model works he has come to be known for over the past several years. In these works, Watt contends broadly with the question of how to make art that addresses queer life absent the inevitable shortcomings of representation. Turning to the spaces and places that ostensibly sustain a queer public sphere, Watt creates dense, memory-laden reconstructions of these sites, at once methodical, critical and tributary. Rendered with materials largely available in the neighbourhood he depicts, the intensely detailed works consider the ways in which these spaces organize and are organized – what they make possible and what they foreclose.

For Laundry Valet, Watt has recreated a laundromat on Davie Street. Pushing at the idea of what makes a space queer, Watt reflects on the laundromat as both an erotically charged place – one that both features prevalently in gay pornography and lore – and a kind of regenerative space, washing away stains both physical and psychic.

- 10 Bath/SRO, 2018
corrugated cardboard, butcher tape, scotch tape, hot glue, linen, cotton, polyester, leather, garbage bag, glitter paper, popsicle sticks, bristol board, plasticine, galvanized wire mesh, fiberglass mesh screen, LED lights, vinyl sticker, plastic straw, paper, cling wrap, postcard, vinyl tube, spring, linen tape, latex tube, metallic cardstock, rubber stopper, wire, aluminum tape, gold metal leaf, latex condom, foam core, adhesive vinyl bumper sheet, inkjet print on paper

Bath/SRO is one of the first models Watt created. Looser in style and more abstracted in form, Watt based this work on a bathhouse located above a Davie Street dollar and party supply store, one where he sources many of the supplies he uses in his work. The title of the work nods to the bathhouse's role not just as a site of sexual exchange, but of low-cost accommodation, often serving as the cheapest room in Vancouver on any given night.

- 11 Little Sister's, 2023
archival cardboard, archival glue, hot glue, laser prints, popsicle sticks, acrylic paint, carpet, acrylic velvet, cotton string, coloured gel, holographic foil, glitter paper, faux fur, window mesh, wire, gems, sequins, lame, aluminum tape, thread, mat board, cardboard, paper, tack, wire mesh, spray foam, rhinestone trim, mirror, plastic coil, glass beads, jewelry chain, lined paper, cotton, metallic pipe cleaner, duct tape, band-aid, rope, plastic bag
Collection of Jeffrey Boone & David Wong

This work sees Watt memorialize famed Vancouver bookstore Little Sister's. Rather than its current home on Davie, however, Watt takes on the original Little Sister's space at 1221 Thurlow, where it occupied the second floor of a now-demolished house from 1983 to 1996. Recreated entirely from images seen in the 2002 Aerlyn Weissman documentary Little Sister's vs Big Brother – which traces the bookstore's landmark twenty-year legal battle with Canada Customs over the seizure of books deemed "obscene" – this model is the only work in the exhibition Watt created without visiting the site. The books that appear in the work are a speculative recollection, drawn from multiple imperfect archives, including a trove of used books donated to Little Sister's, internet searches and images saved to Watt's phone.

- 12 Pumpjack, 2019
cardboard, gold leaf, glass, popsicle sticks, vinyl, velvet, card, plasticized wire, inkjet print, tin foil, beads, chiffon, gaffer tape, mirror, lycra micromesh, newspaper, construction paper, upholstery material, candle, matboard, leather, glitter, tissue paper, ball chain, fishing line, metallic paper, necklace chain, velvet, terry cloth, beads, sequins, ribbon, chalk, embroidery floss, hot glue, plastic gems, organza, dowel, window screen

This pair of works catalogues two bars located a block apart on Davie Street: The PumpJack Pub and Numbers Cabaret. Where Watt's earliest model works saw him recreating spaces entirely from memory, Pumpjack is the first time he began documenting a site in order to recreate it. Three years later, Numbers was produced amidst COVID restrictions, when many of the spaces captured in Watt's works were closed to the public. Working from a combination of recall and a private tour arranged during the bar's closure, the resulting work at once traces the labyrinthine building's idiosyncratic history and architecture – built around an old home, the space previously served as a brothel and an army housing facility – while capturing the spirit, if not exactitude, of its current life as a gay bar. Here, a maze occupies the dance floor, while much of the decor is drawn from memes, images from TV and unrelated photos from the artist's archive.

- 14 Clinic, 2019
foamcore, textured spray paint, stir sticks, carpet, paper, cue cards, plasticine, coloured pencil, health & community information cards, metal mesh, leather, tule, inkjet prints, window screen, clothing tag, acrylic, beads, sequins, vinyl shelf lining, lycra micromesh, string, pencil, popsicle sticks, hot glue, vinyl tube, wire

In this early work, Watt takes on the former Bute Street Sexual Health Clinic. Much like Bath/SRO, this work enacts a more truncated approach to its namesake space, with a composition anchored in rhythm and symmetry rather than spatial verisimilitude. Watt extends, for example, the carpeted hallway that sits between the waiting area and clinical spaces, suggesting a longer, more doomful trek between the two than the facility actually afforded.

cardboard, archival glue, hot glue, metallic foil, mat board, acrylic paint, pipe cleaner, sequins, wooden popsicle stick, aluminum tape, cotton lace, string, glitter paper, feather, stickers, gems, wire, coffee beans, tissue paper, laser jet print, toilet paper, window mesh, wooden skewer, coloured gel, acrylic fabric, cotton fabric, holographic foil, diffusion gel, plaster

For his most recent model, Watt recreates the Davie Street café on which the elements in the exhibition at large are based. Evoking the self-reflexiveness at the heart of Watt's project, the artist engages here the café as both an idealized site of social exchange – a space to congregate, debate, eavesdrop, and otherwise perform socially – and a densely layered system that can never be perfectly captured, occupied or known. The scene Watt presents in the work is an unruly one, replete with animals on the furniture (a nod to the cafe's wildlife-themed table numbers), a jumble of storage and a fully visible back-of-house, with the machinations of the space's operations on full view to its patrons.
